Korean immigrants in America organized patriotic activities in their communities to raise awareness and issued appeals for support from the U.S. government. They also contributed money to the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai yearning to take back their home country.

The special exhibition consists of a prologue, epilogue, and four main parts.

The first part features references related to the United States-Korea Treaty during the invasion of Japanese Imperialism. The second part features the independence movements led by Korean-Americans and the historic sites that are still preserved today. The third part shows the development process of the March 1st movement in 1919 in Korea and America. And lastly, the fourth part features the establishment of the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai on April 11th, 1919 and all the related data of the independence movement groups' movements until Korea declared independence in Chongqing.
